

RM ROLEPLAY TRAINING HANDBOOK

NIO Premium Panels

Module 5 — Task 1 · Selling on Value, Not Price

Win the customer through value and confidence — never through discounts.

A self-learning guide: understand the customer, learn what to say, and practise the conversation on your own.

Start Here: What This Module Is Really About

The customer is not refusing to pay more. They are looking for a good reason to say yes. A reason they can repeat to themselves, to their husband or wife, and to the neighbour who got it done cheaper. When they ask “itna mehnga kyun?”, that is not a “no”. It means “convince me.”

Your job is not to defend a price. Your job is to help the customer feel that spending a little more is the smart choice — not a waste.

The one move that wins this conversation: stop comparing “panel vs panel.” Start comparing “the wall I will love every day” vs “the wall I will just put up with.”

How to use this handbook

1. Read the scenario and the customer’s concerns.
2. Understand what the customer is really thinking and feeling (Section 1).
3. Study the sample lines a great RM would use (Section 3).
4. Practise the conversation out loud — play both the RM and the customer.
5. Review yourself honestly using the self-review in Section 5.

Learning tip — You can use this guide on your own. No trainer needed. Read a little, practise a little, review yourself, repeat.

1. What's Going On in the Customer's Head

Before you can sell to this customer, you have to understand them. This customer has already chosen to talk to Urban Company and is spending real money on their home. Someone who only wants the cheapest panel never reaches this conversation. So when they push back on price, they are not saying no — they are checking whether the extra money is worth it.

Why they really hesitate

- They don't want to feel foolish. The worry isn't "I can't afford it." It's "what if I pay more and look silly — especially in front of the neighbour who got it cheaper?"
- They're not sure the difference will show. "Will I actually see what I'm paying extra for, or is it only in the brochure?" If the value feels invisible, the higher price feels pointless.
- They're not deciding alone. Usually a husband, wife, or family member has a say. The customer is quietly working out how to explain this choice at home.

The real reason they hold back

It's not really about the price. It's a quiet fear: "What if I pay more and later feel it wasn't worth it?"

Here is the thing the customer hasn't realised yet. There are two kinds of regret:

- Paying a bit extra — you feel this once, on the day you pay.
- Living with a wall you don't love — you feel this a little bit every single day, for years.

Right now the first regret feels big and real. The second one feels far away. Your job is to make the second one feel real too. Once the customer pictures looking at that wall every morning, the question changes from "how do I save money?" to "how do I make sure I love this for the next 10 years?"

Coaching tip — This is the heart of the whole module. Don't argue about price. Help the customer feel the cost of choosing cheap — not in rupees, but in the small daily disappointment of a wall they settled for.

What the customer says vs what they really mean

They say...	They really mean...
"Itna mehnga kyun?"	"Give me a reason I can feel good about."
"4–5 saal me badal dunga."	"Help me feel okay spending more on something I might not keep."
"Padosi ne sasta karwa liya."	"I don't want to look like I got fooled."
"Design options kitne hain?"	"After paying premium, will I still get good choices?"

Learning tip — When you hear an objection, answer the real meaning, not just the words. That is what makes a customer feel understood.

What the customer is feeling — and what to use

Use these feelings, roughly in order of power for this conversation:

1. Fear of regret (strongest). “Buy cheap, and you’ll notice it every day.”
2. Pride in good taste. Praise their eye, not their wallet: “aap clearly detail dekhte ho.”
3. Wanting to impress. “Mehmaan poochenge — ye kahan se karwaya?”
4. Staying true to the plan. “Aapne poora ghar soch ke banaya — yahin compromise kyun?”
5. Less stress in choosing. Curated designs feel like help, not fewer options.
6. Your own confidence. If you sound unsure about the price, the customer will feel unsure too.

2. How the Conversation Should Flow

Eight simple steps. Notice that price comes only after the customer can see the value — and the most powerful moment (the “temporary” worry) comes near the end, not the start.

Step	What you do	How the customer feels
1. Set the tone	Be a home advisor, not a panel seller. Talk about their room first.	Relaxed, curious
2. Understand them	Ask about the room, who uses it, why now, their taste, who else decides.	Open, talking freely
3. Paint the picture	Describe the finished wall and how it will feel — before any product talk.	Excited, imagining it
4. Share the price	Give the number openly, then explain what’s included so it’s fair to compare.	Surprised at first
5. Show the difference	Explain what they actually get for a little more.	Starting to agree
6. Handle “temporary”	Turn “I’ll change it in a few years” into “you’ll live with it for years.”	Thinking hard, then softening
7. The design help	Show that designs are hand-picked for them — expert help, not fewer options.	Feels special
8. Close with confidence	Suggest the next step calmly. Give them words to use at home.	Ready: “quote bhej do”

What to share early vs later

Share EARLY: that NIO is a different, higher-quality category (so the price isn’t a shock later); and everything you learned about their home, repeated back so they feel heard.

Share LATER: the exact price (only after they can see the value); the “designs hand-picked for you” moment (save it for near the end); and technical points — bring them up only when they answer a worry the customer actually raised.

3. What a Great RM Actually Says

Real, natural Hinglish — step by step. Don't memorise these word-for-word. Learn the idea, the tone, and why it works. Then say it in your own words.

Step 1–2 — Set the tone and understand the customer

RM: Sir, ek minute panel-vanel chhod ke — pehle ye batao, ye room kiske liye ban raha hai? Ghar me kaun-kaun, mehmaan kitne aate hain? Aur 9–10 saal baad bhi jab aap isme baithoge, kaisa feel karna chahte ho?

RM: Baaki ghar me kya soch rahe ho — flooring, furniture? Koi reference pasand aaya tha, kisi dost ka ghar ya phone pe koi photo? Aur ye decision aap akele le rahe ho ya madam bhi saath me hain?

Coaching tip — You can't suggest the right thing if you don't know what the customer wants. These questions build trust, tell you who really decides, and give you the exact points to use later. Skipping this means you're just guessing.

RM: Sochiye — Sunday subah, dhoop andar aa rahi hai, aap chai lekar sofe pe baithe ho, aur saamne wo wall hai — ek bhi joint nahi, bilkul smooth, ek hi flow. Koi andar aata hai toh sabse pehle wahi dekhta hai aur poochta hai 'ye kahan se karwaya?' Wo feeling — usi ke liye ye wall hai.

Coaching tip — People don't buy a panel. They buy how the room will look and feel. Paint that picture first, so when the price comes, they are comparing it to a wall they already want.

Step 4 — Share the price (open, then make the comparison fair)

Customer: ₹1150 per panel?! Bhai market me toh 250–300 me mil jaata hai.

RM: Bilkul, main number chhupaunga nahi — NIO ka panel kareeb ₹1150 ka hai. Par ek cheez clear kar dun. Market me jo ₹250–300 ka rate milta hai, wo sirf panel ka hota hai. Delivery, installation, carpenter, fitting, finishing — ye sab alag se lagta hai, aur jab poora total banta hai toh wo number kaafi upar chala jaata hai. Hamare yahan ye sab included hai — end to end. Aap ek baar pay karte ho, aur kaam properly ho ke milta hai. Koi bhaag-daud nahi, koi tension nahi.

Coaching tip — Never dodge the price — that makes it look like you're hiding something. Then fix the comparison: the cheap ₹250 is only the bare panel. Once you add delivery, installation and finishing, their "cheap" option climbs a lot. Always compare all-in to all-in.

Step 5 — Show the difference (it's closer to 2x, not 5x)

Customer: Phir bhi, thoda zyada toh pad hi raha hai na?

RM: Haan, thoda zyada hai — par jitna upar se lagta hai utna nahi. Jab aap dono ko poora jod ke dekhoge — panel plus installation plus finishing — toh asli farak kareeb do guna ka aata hai, paanch guna ka nahi. Aur us thode se extra me aapko milta kya hai? Kaafi behtar look, smooth seamless finish, sahi execution, aur poora kaam ek hi jagah se. Matlab paisa thoda zyada, par result aur experience kaafi zyada accha.

RM: Aur dekhne me bhi farak saaf dikhta hai. PVC me har 1 feet par ek joint line aati hai — door se theek lagti hai, paas se nazar aati hai, aur do saal me usme dhool aur halka gap dikhne lagta hai. NIO smooth rehta hai, ek hi surface, aur finish me ek richness hai jo light padte hi dikh jaati hai.

Coaching tip — This is the realistic way to handle the price. Don't claim a "5x better" product — that's hard to defend. Show that the all-in difference is closer to 2x, and that the extra buys clearly better looks, easier execution, and a smoother experience. Turn every feature into something the customer can picture (joints → visible lines and dust in two years; finish → richer look under light).

A quick all-in example you can use (swap in your real project numbers):

Cost item	Ordinary PVC	NIO (with us)
Panel price	₹250–300	₹1,150
Delivery	charged extra	included
Installation + carpenter	charged extra	included
Finishing & cleanup	charged extra	included
End-to-end execution	you coordinate	we handle it
Realistic all-in, per panel	≈ ₹550–650 *	₹1,150

So the real gap is about 2x — not the 5x it looked like at the start. (* The ₹550–650 is an example. Replace it with your actual delivery, installation and finishing costs.)

RM: Dekhiye sir — ₹250 ka panel lagne tak kareeb ₹550–650 ka pad jaata hai, delivery–installation–finishing jod ke. Hamara ₹1150 me ye sab included hai. Toh asli farak do guna ka hai, paanch guna ka nahi.

Learning tip — Before you use this with a customer, fill the table with your real project costs — so your numbers hold up if the customer does the math themselves.

Step 6 — The “temporary” worry (the most important moment)

Customer: Yaar 4–5 saal me waise bhi badal dunga, itna acha lena zaruri hai kya?

RM: Sir, sach bolun? Ye baat maine bahut customers se suni hai — aur asal me 4–5 saal baad koi badalta nahi. Ghar set ho jaata hai, life busy ho jaati hai, aur jo ‘temporary’ soch ke lagaya tha wahi 9–10 saal chal jaata hai. Toh asli sawaal ye hai — jo wall aapko itne saal roz dekhni hai, usme aaj ek baar thoda accha laga lena theek hai, ya har subah halka sa ‘kaash thoda accha karwa leta’ feel karte rehna? Thoda zyada kharch ek baar khalta hai — pay karte waqt. Sasta kaam baar-baar khalta hai — har baar jab nazar uss wall pe padti hai.

Coaching tip — This is the strongest line in the whole module, so save it for here. You gently break the customer's own excuse (“I’ll change it later” — they usually don’t), stretch the timeline to 10 years, and compare a one-time cost to a daily one. Simple idea: good work is remembered long after the price is forgotten.

Step 7 — The design help

Customer: Main accha paisa de raha hoon toh choices bhi milni chahiye — 2000–3000 design me se choose karne milega?

RM: Sir sach kahun? 2000 design dikhana sabse aasaan kaam hai — aur sabse bekaar bhi. Aap thak jaoge, confuse ho jaoge, aur jo choose karoge usme bhi doubt rahega. Humne ulta kiya. Abhi aapne jo bataya — aapka room, light, aapki pasand, ghar ka vibe — uske hisaab se design team ne hazaron me se chaar-paanch best aapke liye nikaale hain. Ye ‘kam options’ nahi hai, ye ‘aapke liye chuna hua best’ hai. Aap akele 2000 me se guess nahi kar rahe — ek poori team aapko sahi tak le ja rahi hai.

Coaching tip — Turn a possible weakness (“fewer options”) into a strength (“expert help, picked for you”). Tie it back to what the customer told you in Step 2, so it feels personal — not like a sales line.

Bonus — give them words to use at home

RM: Aur madam se baat karein toh ye boliye — ek baar accha karwa liya toh agle 10 saal iski taraf dekhna nahi padega. Ye kharcha nahi, ye us wall pe lagaya hua paisa hai jo roz sukoon ke form me wapas aata hai.

Coaching tip — Most home decisions are taken together. If you only convince the person in front of you, the deal can still fall apart at home. Hand them one confident line they can repeat to their family.

Close — calm and confident, no discount

RM: Aapne itni soch-samajh ke poora ghar plan kiya hai — flooring, furniture, sab. Ye ek wall usko complete karegi. Main aapke liye top do designs ke saath quote bana deta hoon — aap aur madam dekh lo. Bas ek baat: isme compromise mat karna. Ye wahi cheez hai jo log aate hi sabse pehle notice karte hain.

Coaching tip — Close on what they’ve already shown — they planned the whole home with care, so settling on the most visible wall feels wrong. Suggest the next step as if it’s natural, and offer zero discount. Your confidence does the work a discount would have done.

4. Where to Sell with Emotion, Not Just Logic

Facts get the customer to “it’s good.” Feelings get them to “I want it.” Here’s where to use which feeling, with a sample line.

Moment	Feeling to use	Sample line
Painting the picture	Excitement about their home	“Sunday subah, dhoop, aur saamne wo smooth wall...”
After they show good taste	Pride	“Aap clearly detail dekhte ho.”
The “temporary” worry	Fear of daily regret (strongest)	“Sasta kaam baar-baar khalta hai — har roz.”
Showing the value	Wanting to impress	“Mehmaan poochenge — ye kahan se karwaya?”
The price comparison	Satisfaction	“Roz dekhke ‘wah’ ya ‘theek hai chal jaayega’?”
The design help	Relief — someone’s helping	“Aapko thakana nahi, sahi tak pahunchana hai.”
The close	Staying true to the plan	“Itna soch ke ghar banaya, yahin compromise nahi.”

Learning tip — Lead with a fact, then add the feeling. Example: “PVC me har 1 feet par joint dikhta hai (fact) — aur wahi cheez roz aapko khatakti rahegi (feeling).”

5. How to Review Your Own Roleplay

You don't need a trainer to get better. After each practice conversation, go through this quick self-review. Be honest with yourself — the point is to improve, not to score yourself. There are no marks here.

What you did well (good signs)

- You asked about the customer's home and needs before talking about the product.
- You shared the price openly, then explained what's included instead of dodging it.
- You compared all-in cost to all-in cost — not the bare ₹250 panel to your full price.
- You turned the “temporary” worry into a “you'll live with it for years” conversation.
- You connected the product to what this customer actually cares about.
- You stayed calm and confident, and never offered a discount.
- You noticed when the customer warmed up, and moved toward closing.

What you could do better (watch-outs)

- You jumped into features before understanding the customer.
- You avoided the price question, or sounded sorry about the price.
- You let the customer compare ₹250 (just the panel) with ₹1150 (everything included).
- You listed all the features quickly instead of choosing the ones that mattered to them.
- You spoke badly about cheaper panels or the neighbour's choice.
- You kept selling even after the customer was ready to say yes.
- You offered a discount to close the deal.

Learning opportunities (ask yourself)

- At which moment did the customer soften? What did I say just before that?
- Where did the customer go quiet or pull back? What could I have asked instead?
- Did I give the customer something to tell their family at home?

Key takeaways (remember these)

- Sell the outcome, not the panel. The wall they'll love every day.
- Fix the price comparison. All-in vs all-in, and everything's included with us.
- The big moment is “temporary”. Turn “I'll change it later” into “you'll see it every day for years.”

Skills to practise next time (pick one)

- Asking better opening questions to understand the customer.
- Explaining “what's included” smoothly and confidently.

- Handling the “temporary” worry without sounding pushy.
- Spotting buying signals and closing at the right time.

6. The Winning Path: Start to Finish

What a great RM does, step by step:

1. Starts as a home advisor, not a seller — puts the product aside and asks about the room and the people in it.
2. Understands the customer first — the why, the budget, the taste, and who really decides.
3. Paints the finished wall, so the customer starts wanting a result, not judging a panel.
4. Shares the price openly, then makes the comparison fair — all-in vs all-in, everything included.
5. Shows the difference is closer to 2x, and that the extra buys clearly better looks and a smoother experience.
6. Handles “temporary” by stretching the timeline to years and comparing a one-time cost to a daily one.
7. Reveals that designs are hand-picked for the customer, so they feel personally looked after.
8. Closes calmly, gives the customer words to use at home, and offers no discount.

Why the customer finally says yes

Not because every feature was listed. The customer says yes because their thinking changed along the way:

- They felt understood — so they trusted the advice.
- The choice was reframed — from “an expense” to “the wall I’ll love every day.”
- The price felt fair — once everything (delivery, installation, finishing) was counted, the gap was small.
- The hidden regret became real — choosing cheap means a small disappointment every day for years.
- They got the words — to explain the choice confidently to their family.
- The RM sounded sure — which quietly told them, “this is clearly worth it.”

By the end, saying no no longer feels like saving money — it feels like settling. And that is how you win on value and confidence, not on discounts.

Quick Reference Cards

The 3 reframes that win

1. Fix the comparison: bare panel price → full all-in price (delivery, installation, finishing all included). The real gap is about 2x, not 5x.
2. Stretch the timeline: “temporary” → “you’ll live with it for years.”
3. Change the question: “panel vs panel” → “the wall I love vs the wall I just tolerate.”

Five lines worth remembering (say them in your own words)

- “Market ka ₹250 sirf panel ka hai — delivery, installation, finishing alag. Hamara sab included hai.”
- “Poora jod ke dekho toh farak do guna ka hai, paanch guna ka nahi.”
- “Thoda zyada kharch ek baar khalta hai, sasta kaam har roz khalta hai.”
- “2000 design dikhana aasaan hai — aapke liye best 4 chunna asli madad hai.”
- “Itna soch ke ghar banaya, yahin compromise theek nahi lagta.”

Do and Don’t

DO	DON’T
Understand the customer before you pitch	List features without knowing the customer
Share the price, then explain what’s included	Dodge the price or sound sorry about it
Compare all-in cost to all-in cost	Let them compare bare ₹250 to your full ₹1150
Agree PVC “works”, then show the daily difference	Speak badly about PVC or the neighbour
Make the everyday experience feel real	Argue about technical specs
Give them words to use at home	Assume the person in front of you decides alone
Close with confidence	Save the deal with a discount

Note on numbers: the product points (smooth seamless finish, stronger and more durable base, premium look) and the ₹1150 / ₹250–300 figures come from the original scenario. Please check the latest NIO pricing and the exact all-in comparison before using them with customers.
